Chris Lilley

SL2 Technician/Product Specialist

The warmer weather has finally arrived, which means there is a higher risk for bacteria to grow. If you begin to experience an increased Bactoscan, there are a few things you can check. First, check for robot and cluster cleaning alarms, TTR and alarms for milk tank or pipe line alarms. Address any alarms that seem precedent. Make sure that the robots are doing 3 cluster cleanings a day. Visual inspections can be done in the main tank, buffer tank or vessel. Any discoloring or build up could be the cause. Make sure to check water quality and if the softener has salt, as changes in water can affect the quality of cleaning. At the robot, it is important to inspect the teat cup liner, six-fold hoses, milk jar for cleanliness and for any type of build up inside components. It's important to check the jetter position to make sure that the cups are lining up and sealing properly. If not, an arm calibration should be done and if necessary you can adjust the jetter position in advanced settings. Any issues or concerns feel free to call into the office.

Another happy Juno owner!

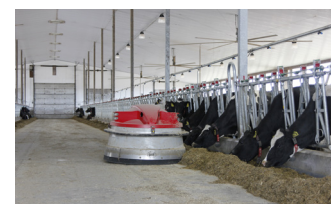

LCW has installed yet another Juno 100 to a very excited/ happy customer! These machines don't only have the ability to increase milk production and feed intake, but they are also very convenient when you are away from the farm. You can always rely on the Juno to make sure your feed is pushed up day and night.

About the Lely Luna Brush

Suitable for short-haired cows older than one year, the Lely Luna design enables the brush to be driven by touch, which then rotates in the opposite direction once the cow pushes against it. This ensures maximum comfort for the cow and a longer brush lifetime. A minimum of moving parts means low maintenance. The Lely Luna cow brush has spirally positioned bristles of variable thickness for maximum comfort.

Once installed, it's important to regularly check the Lely Luna cow brush to ensure an optimal lifetime.

A weekly check is recommended:

- Make sure the brush is clean and free of damage
- When the diameter of the brush is less than 30 cm (12 inches), it should be replaced
- Make sure ventilation openings in the motor housing are clear and clean
- Examine the gearbox for oil leaks
